Charlotte -

Charlotte — Aelmings Human Resource Corporation, the nation's largest minority, female owned human resource organization to Fortune 500 companies, has relocated their headquarters to Charlotte, North Carolina.

Aelmings provides recruiting and staffing services, including training and program development, workforce diversity consulting and organizational development services to a variety of companies and educational institutions, including Progress Energy, Duke University Health System, State of North Carolina, NC State University, Duke Energy, Burt's Bees, Shaw University and the Durham Public School System. In addition, Aelmings offers an array of multicultural programs, including Latin American recruitment and training.

Aelmings has operated out of Raleigh, North Carolina since 1997. The Triangle-area office remains open and fully operational. The move to Charlotte simply broadens Aelmings' presence and availability to clients across the Tarheel state.

"We recognize the potential for business growth in Charlotte," remarked Francina Tate-Harris, CEO of Aelmings. "By moving our headquarters there, we have expanded the wealth of business partnerships available to us."

Aelmings' client roster already consists of several Charlottebased companies, such as Duke Energy.

The new 1,800 square foot facility, which became fully operational in July, is located in the prestigious McGregor Downs area of Southeast Charlotte.

Heading up the new office is Lloyd Diggs, who promises to create a strong center of operation for Aelmings in Charlotte.

"I am honored to lead Aelmings in building a strong presence in Charlotte and look forward to contributing to the business community there," comments Diggs.
